WASHINGTON, D.C. — As we leave the United States for the Far East, there are great and urgent matters demanding resolution that will affect each and every one of us in many ways. The question in operation in our minds is whether some or most of these grave problems will resolve or return to the world's capital around mid-December.

The first of all, is the issue of Korean troubles, now a hundred years in the making. The Korean government is going to court to test the constitutionality of the Taft-Hartley Act under which the United States government forced the workers to return to their jobs, with the threat of fines. The Taft-Hartley Act is a direct result of the workers' strike that took place in the United States in the 1930s, when the country was in the midst of the depression. The purpose of the act was to limit the power of labor unions and to prevent them from engaging in strikes.

However, in the days following the workers' strike, the United States government decided to take a hard-line approach towards labor unions, resulting in the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. The act was signed into law by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1947, and it has since been renewed multiple times.

The issue of Korean troubles is complicated, with many different parties involved. The Korean government is looking to test the constitutionality of the Taft-Hartley Act in the United States Supreme Court, with the hope of finding the act unconstitutional. The Supreme Court is expected to rule on this issue in the near future.
