A MAN NAMED VALACHI—In recent weeks a convicted felon and confessed gangster named Joseph Valachi has been getting an enormous amount of newspaper space and television time. Valachi has been singing like the well-known canary before a Senate committee looking into organized crime. He related in great detail—in such great detail, in fact, that some officials suspected he was making up his story as he went along—the bloody rivalry between Neapolitan and Sicilian factions of the Cosa Nostra crime ring, and naming dozens set Italian-sounding names.

Some Americans were fascinated by Valachi's recital, some were bored, and presumably some were embarrarsed simply because this hoarse-voiced, ungrammatical hoodium was airing dirty linen in the public gaze. I suppose there were some Nisei in each of these three categories.

public gase. I suppose these categories.

Now, just for fun, let's make a wild assumption. Let's say that rather than an Italian American named Valueni on the stand, it was a Japanese American named Yamadama or Nakagada or Motogoto spitting his guts about gang and gambling activity in the LiT Tokyos of the American West Coast thirty and forty years ago. Let's say he named the gambling overlords, the enemies that were wiped out, the illicit fortunes that were assembled, the blood-brotherhoods that enforced the law of the upderworld.

How would you feel about the airing of this sort of dirty linen? Would you be more fascinated by Yamadama's confessions than Valachi's? Would you be more bored? Would you be more embarrassed because the canary's name was Nakagada or Motogoto rather than Valachi? And if so, why?

AN ITALIAN 'NISEI'S' POINT OF VIEW — Just out of curiosity, I asked a second generation American of Italian descent what he thought about the Valachi hearings. His reaction may or may not be typical, but at least it was revealing.

Sure, he was interested in what Valachi had to say, he admitted, but he guessed his interest was no more and no less intense than that of any other American. Was he embarrassed because Valachi expression had to do with Italy American criminal because Valachi expression had to do with Italy American criminal because Valachi expression had to do with Italy American criminal because Valachi expression had to do with Italy American criminal because Valachi expression had to do with Italy American criminal because Valachi expression had to do with Italy American criminal because Valachi expression had to do with Italy American criminal because Valachi expression and the valachi expression of the valachi expression and the valachi intense than that of any other American, was ne embarrased because Valachi's confessions had to do with Italo-American criminals? Not particularly. My friend pointed out that there are criminal elements in every society, and it was just too bad if some of them had Italian names. And even though his name had Italian origins and he still enjoyed spagheth two or three times week, he saw no reason to associate himself in any way with a bunch of New York thus.

no reason to absociate himself in any way with a bunch of New York thugs.

"I'm a law-apiding family man," he said. "I've never been in jail. Once in a while I get a traffic ticket, I like a game of poker and I buy chances in the office pool, but that's about the extent of my law-breaking and gambling. There is no reason to feel I'm associated with gangsters just because of our mutual origins. And I don't think my friends and associates look at me in an odd way just because another spaghetti-eater happens to be named as the boss of the Mafia."

How ABOUT US?—Would the majority of Japanese Americans take a similarly objective position if they were in a similar situation? I don't know. Would their non-Nisei associates? It's a good guess that they would be somewhat more objective than the Nisei themselves because the Nisei as a group tend to be deeply intro-
