Summary: JACL activities since Jan. 1973

Cleveland

The subject of uniform dues is one that has been a source of discussion and debate within the JACL for many years. It is a complex issue that has been influenced by various factors, including economic conditions, membership demographics, and the overall health of the organization.

The discussion around uniform dues began in the 1970s and has continued to the present day. In 1973, a proposal for a fixed sum of dues was presented by the National Committee on Compensation. The proposal was aimed at creating a more uniform and predictable financial structure for the JACL. The proposal was met with mixed reactions, with some members supporting it and others opposing it. The National Committee on Compensation was dissolved in 1975, and the issue of uniform dues was once again put on hold.

In the years that followed, the JACL saw a steady increase in membership dues. This was largely due to the economic conditions of the time and the increasing cost of operating the organization. The JACL recognized the need to adjust dues to keep pace with inflation and ensure the financial health of the organization. In 1980, the JACL adopted a new dues structure that allowed for increases in dues based on the consumer price index. This structure has been in place ever since.

Over the years, the JACL has faced challenges in maintaining its financial stability. The organization has been forced to make difficult decisions about how to allocate its resources and prioritize its programs. Despite these challenges, the JACL has remained committed to its mission of serving the needs of its members and advocating for the rights of Japanese Americans.

In conclusion, the issue of uniform dues is one that has been a recurring theme in the history of the JACL. It is a complex issue that has been shaped by a variety of factors, including economic conditions, membership demographics, and the overall health of the organization. The JACL has faced challenges in maintaining its financial stability, but it has remained committed to its mission of serving the needs of its members and advocating for the rights of Japanese Americans.

From the Frying Pan

Sheridan, Wyo. — The 11th Annual Western Writers Workshop has moved out from the far reaches of the state as well as out of the building at Wyoming State College. The workshop has driven as far as 150 miles to reach Sheridan, and the group of authors have set up houses in various parts of the city.

In their homes the authors were strictly enforced. It would be a long and not happen.

The end justifies the means?

Last Thursday, a group of well-meaning but wildly different people gathered on the lawn of the California National Guard building for a peace demonstration. The organizers, who had been planning the event for months, were determined to make their voices heard against the war in Vietnam.

But as they stood in front of the building, a group of counter-protesters began to march across the lawn. The organizers were caught off guard and ended up retreatting into the building.

While I agree that the end justifies the means, I think that the means themselves are important. We cannot justify violent means to achieve our goals.

The protesters were trying to make their voices heard, but they ended up causing more harm than good. It's important to remember that non-violent protest is the best way to achieve our goals.
