PACIFIC CITIZEN 101

The official publication of the JACL is called Pacific Citizen.

The official publication is not restricted to being a semimonthly newspaper (except once in December and January) or a weekly newspaper as some may still wish we return to or just a newspaper. The Pacific Citizen could be a weekly digital publication combined with a quarterly recap summary newsprint edition. The Pacific Citizen is not going away. This is the official publication of the JACL.

The objectives of the Pacific Citizen are to (1) communicate with and educate JACL members and the community at large on the issues of importance to the JACL and the Asian Pacific Islander community; (2) inform the readership of news affecting the Japanese American community; and (3) serve as a public relations vehicle. Each issue strives to do this.

The Executive Editor is appointed by the National Board based upon recommendations by the Pacific Citizen Editorial Board. The Executive Editor is not hired by the Executive Director of the JACL, which also means the Executive Editor does not report to nor is accountable to the Executive Director of the JACL for personnel, operations or fiscal matters.

The Executive Editor administers the affairs of the Pacific Citizen and implements the policies of the National Council as directed by the National Board and the Pacific Citizen Editorial Board. The Executive Editor is directly accountable to the National Board and the Pacific Citizen Editorial Board.

The Executive Editor supervises the Pacific Citizen office and all Pacific Citizen staff and, under the supervision of the National Secretary/Treasurer, disburses funds for all Pacific Citizen activities in accordance with the mandates of the National Council and National Board.

In 2015, the Pacific Citizen had expenses of approximately $369,000 (including salaries) or $20,000 less than budgeted. The Pacific Citizen raised revenue totaling approximately $174,000 but missed the budgeted revenue target by $116,000-plus.

For 2016, the Pacific Citizen budget for expenses is approximately $345,000 with the reduction from 2015 primarily coming from the move to an office with a lower monthly lease. The budgeted revenue goal is $263,000.

The original budget was approved by National Council at the 2014 San Jose Convention. The National Council will have an opportunity to pass a new budget in less than 60 days in Las Vegas.

I present this background because although the Spring Campaign goal is $100,000, the Spring Campaign probably needs to raise closer to $150,000 for 2016. And this goal will mostly have to rise in 2017 and 2018 assuming the same cost structure and publication product as well as decline in membership revenue. Two donations totaling $38,000 were made in 2015. Several more significant donations of this size would enable the Pacific Citizen to continue producing a semimonthly newspaper mailed to 8,000-plus members and nonmembers in 2016.

Give BIG.

Sincerely,

Sheldon Arakaki,
PNWDC Governor and
P.C. Editorial Board Member

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

P.C. reaches readers of all ages. Following is a Letter to the Editor from California 4th/5th grade Girl Scout Madison Mitsuuchi in response to "Sushi Alert: Grim Outlook for Bluefin Tuna (P.C., April 22-May 5, 2016).

Dear Editor,

I do agree that people are overfishing Bluefin Tuna. I do really like sushi, but if they keep overfishing Bluefin Tuna around the world, there aren't going to be any left for people to eat.

Even though lots of sushi lovers like Bluefin Tuna, they should slow down on eating it because pretty soon they will become extinct, and there will be no more Blue Fin Tuna because they can't lay eggs because they're caught and eaten by sushi lovers!

If we don't slow down immediately, there will be a problem in the world that has to do with sushi! I don't want there to be a problem in the world that has to do with sushi, do you?

Well, if you don't like sushi or fish, I don't care what you think! But if you do like sushi or fish, then I do care a lot!

Sincerely,

Madison

A MOTHER'S TAKE

LIVING ABOVE THE LINE

By Marsha Aizumi

Recently, I received a message from a mother who asked me, "How do you deal with all the hatred that is in the world?" She has a transgender son, and so I knew her question was directed at me because I, too, have a transgender son, and there are so many states that are trying to implement laws against our children.

Her question made me stop and think, "How do I deal with all the hatred and discrimination that gains so much public scrutiny around the country?" I gave her a concise answer about looking for the blessings around me and focusing on what is positive in my life rather than focusing on the negativity that often consumes the news, but her question caused me to reflect even further.

For those of you who know me well, I am a mother who writes inspiring quotes down in a journal. I read nonfiction books and try to distill the message down into one or two simple sentences that become a formula for me to follow.

When a challenge confronts me and I get stuck, I pull out my book of quotes or formulas and look for one that will help me. With this mother's question, I realized that there is one formula that I use more than others, and it has helped me get through many challenging situations. I call this formula: "Living Above the Line."

Positive Feelings (Above the Line)

(Hope, Joy, Courage, Gratitude, Openness, Compassion, Acceptance, Patience, Humility, Love)

Negative Feelings (Below the Line)

(Guilt, Shame, Anger, Resentment, My Way Is the Only Way, Blame, Judgment, Fear, Worry)

I believe I attract what I put my attention and intention on. During the time Aiden was getting physically assaulted because he did not fit the socially acceptable stereotype of his gender, I realize the more I worried, was afraid and got angry, the more things seemed to happen that were negative.

When I worried that others would bully Aiden, he seemed to get bullied more. When I was afraid that the world was not a safe place for Aiden, he would get into a fight or get physically assaulted. I was operating below the line with negative feelings and attracting more of these things into our lives.

On the opposite side, when I went out and spoke to raise awareness, when I saw things that made me grateful, or when I looked for ways that I could responsibly make situations better, I became more aware. I found more things to be grateful for, and more blessings came my way.

In other words, when I operated "Below the Line," I got more negativity happening in my life. And when I operated "Above the Line," I got more things that made me feel positive.

Now realistically, I understand that erasing all negative thought is not possible, but what I also found is that if I felt negative things and I switched to operating "Above the Line" quickly, the negativity did not have time to manifest itself. So, I started to understand that the faster I moved out of the negative, the greater the chance I would be able to attract more that was positive.

Recently, I have had a number of personal challenges. For a moment, I could tell I was living "Below the Line," feeling guilty, worried and fearful of the outcome of these situations.

But then, as luck would have it, I was writing this article.

I immediately thought of ways I could feel hopeful, grateful and full of joy, and so two days later, I received this Mother's Day surprise. My son was asked to write me a letter, and it was published in the Huffington Post through an article that Laurin Mayeno, the mother of a gay son, wrote.

Here is Aiden's letter:

Dear Mammo,

Happy Mother's Day! I have the greatest fortune of being your son and getting to experience your love. I have watched you become an amazing voice in the LGBTQ community and to see you fight for me so that I can have the best life possible. There aren't enough ways to say how grateful I am for that. I know that I don't always say, "I love you," but I want you to know that even when I don't say it out loud that I do.

I love you for holding my hand when I was feeling anxious. I love you for standing by me when I came out as trans and taking care of me after top surgery. I love you for always reminding me that I am loved no matter what. And even though you do all these awesome LGBTQ things that I also love you for, I love you for just being my mom. I don't know where I would be without the love and support you have given me. You are always there to support me in the times that I struggle, and are there to celebrate the times where I succeed. Thank you for loving me unconditionally. I love you the most!

Your loving son, Aiden

I willingly choose acceptance over judgment, hope over fear and love over hate. And if there was ever a sign that living "Above the Line" was worth the effort, it was Aiden sharing his heart with me

A YONSEI TRANSPLANTED

GLOBALIZATION, ALL STRINGS ATTACHED

By Matthew Ormseth

Here in London, the American presidential circus has taken a back seat in the press to a fast-approaching referendum that will decide whether the United Kingdom leaves or stays in the European Union. The decision, dubbed the Brexit, is slated for the 23rd of June and has quickly become a source of bitter contention among Britons.

The Brexit has seemingly split British society right down the middle — Prime Minister David Cameron is a staunch opponent of leaving the EU, but many high-profile politicians have supported the move, most prominent among them Boris Johnson, the eccentric but popular mayor of London. The Guardian's most recent survey placed popular approval for the Brexit at 52 percent and disapproval at 48 percent.

If it's true that history moves in cycles of action and reaction, contraction and relaxation, then we might be witnessing a severe backlash against the globalization of the latter half of the 20th century.

Western governments knitted together the bitter enemies of France, Germany and England in 1993 to form the EU, believing they could keep tensions to a minimum by making war between the old rivals economically unfeasible.

Treaties like NAFTA and the creation of the ASEAN Free Trade Area supplied the U.S. with cheap labor and hordes of consumers while providing the people of Asia and Central and South America a dizzying array of new products.

Trade was bringing everyone together; it was making everyone richer, and it was giving everyone better and cheaper things.

But now, populist candidates around the world are raking in the votes on promises to scale back globalization. Supporters of the Brexit argue that the U.K. has been paying the difference when the weaker economies of countries like Greece, Spain and Portugal come up short.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel's decision to fund a bailout for Greece's flailing economy was deeply unpopular in her country. And in the U.S., of course, Donald Trump captured the Republican Party's presidential nomination by promising to bring jobs back from Asia and threatening to start a trade war with China.

It's true that globalization has produced big winners and big losers in the past 50 years.

The winners tend to be the few who had the capital to open factories or import-export operations in countries with dirt-cheap labor and lenient protective tariffs — people like Trump, coincidentally, whose signature line of ties is manufactured in China.

The losers, however, are many. Chief among them are blue-collar workers in countries that saw entire industries pack up and leave in search of greener, less-expensive pastures.

The jury's still out on whether the people who make up the aforementioned dirt-cheap labor in places like China and Bangladesh have benefited from the miracle of globalization, but when you hear about accidents like the Rana Plaza collapse in 2013 that killed 1,130 people, or Apple factory hands in China throwing themselves off of parking garages after 14-hour workdays, you really start to think twice before singing the praises of a global economy.

The problem is we've grown used to the conveniences of said economy, even as we're applauding politicians who promise to throw the process in reverse.

Here in England, nativist parties decry the influx of immigrants from Eastern Europe and the Middle East, and even more mainstream parties — like Cameron's own Conservative Party — have voiced concerns over the permeability of England's borders as part of the Schengen Agreement.

There aren't enough jobs in England as it is, they say. Why let in even more job-seeking immigrants?

In the U.S., Trump tells his supporters he'll wrench back the jobs our callous politicians signed over to China. We'll make things in America, for Americans, he says. Only that plan won't work, not if Americans are unwilling to work for the five cents an hour that Bangladeshi sweatshops pay. It won't work if Americans are unwilling to pay some $30 for a T-shirt, the price retailers would be forced to charge to cover the cost of hiring American labor.

MEMORIAL DAY CEREMONY AT ARLINGTON CEMETERY HONORS JAPANESE AMERICAN VETERANS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The 68th annual Memorial Day service honoring Japanese American servicemen buried at Arlington National Cemetery in Washington, D.C., was held on May 29.

The late Key Kobayashi and Mike Masaoka organized the event in 1948, and the Memorial Day event is currently the longest-running Memorial Day event at Arlington Cemetery held by any civic organization.

The DC JACL Chapter, which has been involved in the ceremony since its inception, and the Japanese American Veterans Assn. co-sponsored the event.

The Kobayashi family has chaired the event for 68 years, and three generations of the family have helped organize the event. This year, Turner Kobayashi chaired the ceremony, which featured speakers Sophia Kim, a fifth-grader at Spark Matsunaga Elementary School, and Terry Shima, a veteran of the famed 442nd Regimental Combat Team.

Shima shared a story about Saburo Tanamachi of Houston, Texas, the first Japanese American buried at Arlington. Tanamachi died in the arms of the late George “Joe” Sakato, recipient of the Medal of Honor.

Following his squad leader’s death, Sakato led the charge on the Battle of the Lost Texan Battalion that was recognized as an act of extreme heroism.

Michelle Amano, granddaughter of Mike Masaoka, recited the JACL creed. Flowers were also laid at the graves of 80 veterans by those who attended the service. ■

JANM President/CEO Greg Kimura Resigns

LOS ANGELES — Japanese American National Museum President/CEO G. W. Greg Kimura has resigned, announced JANM officials on May 20. Kimura is leaving the museum to pursue other career opportunities.

Kimura, who has been at JANM for four years, will serve his last day on June 30, the end of the museum’s fiscal year. The Board of Trustees will then provide oversight and work with the Center for Nonprofit Management to select an interim CEO to serve until a successor is appointed by the board. Former U.S. Transportation Secretary Norman Mineta, who is chair of the JANM Board of Trustees, will lead a nationwide search for a successor.

“It has been a privilege working with so many dedicated professionals who care deeply about the mission and future of the museum,” said Kimura. “After four years at the helm, I feel that a change in leadership at this point will be healthy for the organization and for me. I thank my team and museum volunteers, members and donors I’ve had the honor of working with, and look forward to the museum’s continued growth as a renowned cultural institution.”

Rep. Mark Takai Will Not Run for Re-Election Due to Health Concerns

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Rep. Mark Takai (D-Hawaii) announced May 19 that he will not be seeking a second term due to health concerns.

“It has been my greatest privilege to serve the people of Hawaii for the past 20 years,” Takai said in a statement. “As your congressman, I made it my mission to always put Hawaii and her people first. . . . When I was diagnosed with pancreatic cancer last year, my family and I resolved to fight it head-on and with deep personal faith. Today, we find ourselves at a crossroads. I had truly hoped to aggressively fight this cancer while seeking my re-election, but I recently learned that my cancer has spread.”

Takai intends to serve out the remainder of his term in Congress. In a statement issued on May 20 by President Barack Obama, “Michelle and I thank Mark for his leadership and service, but also for his courage and tireless advocacy for cancer research — research that has given hope to others who fight this disease every day. And we want Mark to know that he and his family have our continued support and warmest wishes on their journey ahead.”

Eighth-Grader Finishes Tied for Seventh in the National Spelling Bee

NATIONAL HARBOR, MD. — Eighth-grade student Cooper Komatsu, 13, of Culver City Middle School in Culver City, Calif., finished tied for seventh in the 89th Scripps National Spelling Bee, which concluded on May 26 at the Gaylord National Resort and Convention.

Komatsu advanced to the ninth round after correctly spelling such words as “cacomixl,” “glaucothoe” and “myoclonus” before faltering on the spelling of “illicium,” a genus of flowering plant. Komatsu also completed in last year’s competition, tying for 11th place. In 1955, his grandfather, Robert Rosenberg, also competed in the Spelling Bee.

THE IMPORTANCE OF A MULTIFAITH MOVEMENT FOR JAPANESE AMERICANS AND MUSLIM AMERICANS TODAY

By Kristi Lin, Florin JACL
Manzanar Ambassador

This year's Florin Manzanar Pilgrimage, organized in partnership by the Florin JACL and the Sacramento Valley Council on American Islamic Relations (CAIR-SV), brought 50 diverse individuals on a three-day journey to the former Japanese incarceration camp of Manzanar. In 2015, the Florin Japanese American Citizen's League (Florin JACL) and Britt Sumida, the former Student Affairs Officer of the UC Davis Department of Asian American Studies, aspired to conceive a leadership program that would expand knowledge about the Japanese American World War II incarceration camps. The program emerged as the Manzanar Ambassador program, where college students are sponsored to join the Florin Manzanar Pilgrimage and then spend a year of service educating their communities about their experiences.

Kristi Lin, a fourth-year Landscape Architecture major at the University of California, Davis, has served as a Manzanar Ambassador since the program started in 2015.

What does multifaith mean? Groundswell, a multifaith social justice organization started by Sikh activist Valarie Kaur, defines "multifaith" as a setting where "people motivated by faith, spirituality or moral commitment stand up, speak out, work together and take action."

During this year's Florin JACL and CAIR-SV Manzanar Pilgrimage, Lin traveled with eight former incarceratedees, two Buddhist priests, eight Muslim Americans, 20 youth and 12 other teachers, civil rights lawyers, professors and diverse community organizers.

Kristi Lin is a fourth-year UC Davis college student.

Although many parallels can be drawn between the discrimination against Japanese Americans during WWII and Muslim Americans post-9/11, the circumstances are different because Muslim Americans are a religious group that is very racially diverse.

According to the Pew Research Center's 2011 Muslim American survey, 30 percent describe themselves as white, 23 percent as black, 21 percent as Asian, 6 percent as Hispanic and 19 percent as other or mixed race. Since the discrimination that Muslim Americans are facing is primarily due to their religion, we must explore the challenges and opportunities of building a multifaith movement where religious diversity is promoted as a source of social good.

Through serving as a Manzanar Ambassador last year, I went on the pilgrimage and became friends with two Muslim American UC Davis students. Inspired to educate our peers after the pilgrimage, we organized a presentation together titled, "Japanese American Incarceration Then, Islamophobia Now — History Is Repeating Itself, What Is Our Role?" at the Multifaith Living Community at UC Davis.

Much to our surprise, over 80 students came. One Asian American Studies professor even offered extra credit to students who wrote an analysis of how the event's location in a religious space might have informed, influenced or limited the dialogue.

During our presentation, religion came into the discussion multiple times as we talked about the Quakers helping many Nisei get out of camp and attend college, the vandalism of mosques and the ways for all students to help the Muslim Students Assn.

at UC Davis raise money for Syrian refugees.

I believe that the Multifaith Living Community was the optimal space for our dialogue. We simply cannot address Islamophobia or its political ramifications without bringing religion to the table.

Talking about religious diversity teaches us to search for our similarities while understanding that we may have profoundly different worldviews. But let's not only have conversations. Let's create experiences, like the Florin Manzanar Pilgrimage, to really get to know people from different religious and nonreligious groups.

Let's not succumb to the standard that multifaith spaces can only be places where people from different religions light candles side by side. Let's use a multifaith movement to address the issues we face today.

JACL FLORIN CHAPTER AWARDS ITS 2016 SCHOLARSHIP RECIPIENTS

The Florin Chapter of the Japanese American Citizens League honored five outstanding students attending schools in the Sacramento area as recipients of its 2016 scholarship awards. The event was held on May 14 at the annual Scholarship Recognition and Manzanar Reunion Ice Cream Social.

Each applicant was judged on achievements in academics and scholastic honors; extracurricular activities including leadership positions, community involvement, work history and Japanese cultural activities; JACL involvement; and community service as shown in the written application, letter of recommendation and personal interview.

The 2016 Florin JACL Scholarship winners include four graduating high school seniors and one college student. This year's scholarships were presented in honor of individuals or groups that have contributed significantly to Florin JACL through leadership, service and monetary donations.

The chapter is pleased to award this year's recipients:

Breana Mayumi Inoshita, daughter of Robert and Laura Inoshita of Stockton, is a University of California, Davis, student double majoring in Asian American Studies and Community and Regional Development.

Inoshita has been involved in JACL activities in Stockton and Lodi since her youth, and during her sophomore year at UC Davis, became active in the Florin JACL chapter as a leadership intern.

During her tenure as the UCD intern, she helped design and secure funding for a Manzanar Ambassador Scholarship Program, and worked on several chapter committees including the Time of Remembrance, Manzanar Pilgrimage, Facebook co-administrator and Civil and Human Rights.

Inoshita attended the National JACL Convention in 2015 as a chapter delegate, participated in the Kakehashi Japan exchange program in March and was recently selected as a Northern California Cherry Blossom princess.

With an interest in Japanese language and culture, she attended the Sakura Gakuen Japanese language classes at the Sacramento Betsuin and studied Japanese classical dancing, Nihon Buyo, for many years. At age 16, she tested and earned her professional name in the Bando style of classical dancing.

She is also actively involved in many human and civil rights organizations and intends to attend law school specializing in civil rights law or environmental law. It is fitting that she was awarded the Mark Merin Civil Rights Scholarship. Paul Masuhara, an associate of Mark Merin, presented the award to Inoshita.

Brian T. Ishisaka, son of Denis and Lesly Ishisaka, will graduate from the C. K. McClatchy High School Humanities and International Studies Program (HISP) in June. He will attend Boston University.

Ishisaka's honors include Metro League championships in varsity cross-country track and tennis, and a national honor patrol award in Boy Scout Troop 50. Active in high school sports, he was captain of the varsity men's tennis team and the C. K. McClatchy junior varsity basketball team, as well as a member of the varsity cross-country team and varsity basketball teams.

In addition, he is the co-founder and president of the C. K. McClatchy Book Club, staff writer and photo editor of the school newspaper, The Prospector, and student representative on the School Site Council.

He has played basketball with the Sacramento Rebel Basketball organization since 2011, and served as an assistant coach at the Sacramento Asian Sports Foundation "Basic Hoops" camp. He has also helped as a referee for the Sacramento Buddhist Church E Division League since 2012.

JAPANESE AMERICAN LEADERSHIP CONVENE FOR ALL CAMPS CONSORTIUM

Participants, including representatives from all 10 War Relocation Authority confinement sites, come together to educate the broader community.

By Helen Yoshida,
Contributor

Leadership from national Japanese American organizations and all 10 War Relocation Authority confinement sites convened in Washington, D.C., from May 12-14 for an All Camps Consortium meeting.

The Consortium is a collaborative effort to build each organizations' capacity to preserve, protect and interpret historic sites, artifacts and stories from the Japanese American incarceration experience during World War II.

The three-day event began with a reception at Japanese Ambassador Kenichiro Sasae's residence, where former Secretary of Commerce and Transportation Norman Mineta recognized National Park Service Director Jonathan B. Jarvis on behalf of the Consortium for his work to preserve the history of the World War II Japanese American confinement experience.

"We are grateful that you have promoted stewardship, educational programs for the public and the engagement of new audiences to the Japanese American story, a tragic chapter in our history," said Mineta. "Your conscientious supervision of the Japanese American Confinement Sites (JACS) Program and support of Japanese American sites in the National Park Service reflects a tremendous commitment to preserve these historic places, so future generations may learn and gain inspiration from them."

On May 13, site representatives and stakeholder organizations met at the Washington, D.C., offices of Hogan Lovells LLP to discuss the objectives and structure of the Consortium and effort required to create a successful and sustainable network.

More than 60 participants attended, including delegates from Arkansas State University (Rohwer and Jerome sites), Former Secretary of Commerce and Transportation Norman Mineta gives a keynote speech during the All Camps Consortium meeting.

Amache Historical Society II, Friends of Manzanar, Friends of Minidoka, Gila River, Heart Mountain Wyoming Foundation (HMWF), Manzanar Committee, Minidoka Pilgrimage, Poston Community Alliance, Topaz Museum, Tule Lake Committee and the Japanese Peruvian Oral History Project.

Stakeholder organizations represented were the Ad Hoc Committee of the "Japanese American History: Not for Sale" Facebook page, Amherst College, Asian Pacific American Institute for Congressional Studies, Denso, Fred T. Korematsu Institute, Go For Broke National Education Center, Japanese American Citizens League, Japanese American National Museum, Kizuna, National Japanese American Memorial Foundation, the National Japanese American Historical Society, NPS, National Veterans Network, Oregon Cultural Heritage Commission, Oregon Nikkei Endowment, Smithsonian National Museum of American History and Yale University.

While there have been "All Camps" summits in previous years, partnerships have not been sustained between groups. While the JACS program has helped build public awareness around the incarceration history, groups have tended to work in isolation. However, a renewed interest to build a lasting network resulted in the HMWF's successful bid for JACS funding to form an All Camps Consortium.

"These stakeholders must work together to preserve the original sites and stories of incarceration, build each organization's capacity to share resources and information and educate the broader community. In creating this Consortium, we are fostering a culture of communication, inclusiveness and multigenerational engagement to ensure that this history is not forgotten," said HMWF Chair Shirley Ann Higuchi.

Psychotherapist and former Tule Lake incarcerated Satsuki Ina led a discussion about how preserving the history and original sites of the incarceration experience is essential to healing the trauma and divisions that persist in the Japanese American community. She described how past generations lost their dignity, dreams, livelihoods, educational opportunities and more with the forced removal and discussed how this meeting marked a historic gathering of leaders.

"This call for an All Camps Consortium demands that we move beyond the age-old camp divide," Ina said.

The Consortium's foundation was established through an initial August 2015 meeting at the Heart Mountain Interpretive Center in Wyoming. This second gathering in the nation's capital featured keynote presentations by Ina and Mineta, structured brainstorming sessions led by Denso Executive Director Tom Ikeda and panel discussions around connecting the confinement sites to Washington, D.C., engaging younger audiences and conservation updates on the Allen H. Eaton items.

Representatives from the Arkansas State University Heritage Sites (Rohwer and Jerome sites), the Ad Hoc Committee of "Japanese American History: Not for Sale," APAICS, Denso, Friends of Minidoka, HMWF, Kizuna, JACL, Minidoka Pilgrimage Planning Committee, NJAMF, NJAHS, NPS and the Tule Lake Committee formed a steering committee to move the Consortium effort into its next phase.

More than 60 representatives from national Japanese American organizations and all 10 War Relocation Authority confinement sites participated in the All Camps Consortium meeting on May 13.

The event closed with presentations at the National Japanese American Memorial on May 14. Franklin Odo, founding director of the Smithsonian Asian Pacific American Center, noted the ability of memorials to tell stories that are often not included in the nation's recorded history. He was followed by Memorial architect Davis Buckley, who discussed the memorial's history and symbolism. To create a compelling memorial, Buckley noted that all participants involved should advocate for the project each day they are working on it.

"Through good friends in Congress who recognized founding principles of what the memorial represents, we got the memorial," Buckley said.

Following the presentations, NJAMF leadership announced six student scholarship winners from across the nation who are creating digital stories of the camps to supplement memorial visitors' experiences.

Martha Castro of the College Preparatory School in Oakland, Calif.; Carolyn Hoover and Reed Leventis of Walt Whitman High School in Bethesda, M.D.; Julia Shin of Shaker Heights High School in Shaker Heights, Ohio; Halle Sousa of Notre Dame High School in San Jose, Calif.; and Connor Yu of Georgetown Day School in Washington, D.C., will tell the stories of Tule Lake, Topaz, Poston, Manzanar, Amache and Heart Mountain, respectively.

These students will also travel to Wyoming to participate in a Digital Storytelling Workshop during the Heart Mountain Pilgrimage, which is set for July 29-30. The students will work with Emmy Award-winning filmmakers Jeff MacIntyre and David Ono to incorporate summer research and interviews with former incarcerated to create short films using audio, video, photographs and music.

Excerpts will be aired during the pilgrimage, and postproduction on the students' stories will be conducted by the filmmakers. The completed stories will be uploaded to an app for memorial visitors, and it is hoped that they will be widely shared online to not only raise awareness but also foster youth engagement and show how lessons from the incarceration experience are still relevant to preserving Americans' rights and liberties today.

OBAMA USES HIROSHIMA VISIT AS OPPORTUNITY TO URGE NO NUKES

During his historic visit, the president acknowledges — but does not apologize for — the U.S. atomic bombing on Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

By Associated Press

HIROSHIMA, JAPAN — With an unflinching look back at a painful history, President Barack Obama stood on the hallowed ground of Hiroshima on May 27 and declared it a fitting place to summon people everywhere to embrace the vision of a world without nuclear weapons.

As the first American president to visit the city where the U.S. dropped the first atomic bomb, Obama came to acknowledge — but not apologize for — an act many Americans see as a justified end to a brutal war that Japan started with a sneak attack at Pearl Harbor.

Some 140,000 people died after a U.S. warplane targeted wartime Hiroshima on Aug. 6, 1945, and 70,000 more perished in Nagasaki, where a second bomb was dropped three days later. Japan soon surrendered.

“Their souls speak to us,” Obama said of the dead. “They ask us to look inward, to take stock of who we are and who we might become.”

With a lofty speech and a warm embrace for an elderly survivor, Obama renewed the call for a nuclear-free future that he had first laid out in a 2009 speech in Prague.

This time, Obama spoke as a far more experienced president than the one who had employed his upbeat “Yes, we can” campaign slogan on the first go-round.

The president, who has made uneven progress on his nuclear agenda over the past seven years, spoke of “the courage to escape the logic of fear” as he held out hope for diligent, incremental steps to reduce nuclear stockpiles.

“We may not realize this goal in my lifetime, but persistent effort can roll back the possibility of catastrophe,” he said.

Obama spent less than two hours in Hiroshima but seemed to accomplish what he came for. It was a choreographed performance meant to close old wounds without inflaming new passions on a subject still fraught after all these years.

In a solemn ceremony on a sun-washed afternoon, Obama and Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe placed wreaths before the cenotaph, a simple arched stone monument at Hiroshima’s Peace Memorial Park. Only the clicking of camera shutters intruded on the moment as Obama closed his eyes and briefly bowed his head.

Then, after each leader gave brief remark, Obama approached two aging survivors of the bombing who were seated in the front row, standing in for the thousands still seared by memories of that day.

Ninety-one-year-old Sunao Tsuboi, the head of a survivors group, energetically engaged the president in conversation, telling Obama he would be remembered as someone who listened to the voice of a few survivors. He urged him to come back and meet more.

Obama stepped over to meet historian Shigeaki Mori. Just 8 when the bomb hit, Mori had to hold back tears at the emotion of the moment.

Obama patted him on the back and wrapped him in a warm embrace. From there, Obama and Abe walked along a tree-lined path toward a river that flows by the iconic A-bomb dome, the skeletal remains of an exhibition hall that stands as silent testimony to the awful power of the bomb blast 71 years ago and as a symbol for international peace.

Abe welcomed the president’s message and offered his own determination “to realize a world free of nuclear weapons, no matter how long or how difficult the road will be.”

Obama received a Nobel Peace Prize early in his presidency for his anti-nuclear agenda but has seen uneven progress. The president can point to last year’s Iran nuclear deal and a weapons treaty with Russia. But North Korea’s nuclear program still looms as a threat, and hopes for a pact for further weapons reductions with Russia have stalled. Critics also fault the administration for planning a big and costly program to upgrade U.S. nuclear stockpiles.

Just as Obama had delicate sensitivities to manage in Hiroshima, so, too, did Abe. The Japanese leader made a point to dismiss any suggestion that he pay a reciprocal visit to Pearl Harbor.

Abe did not rule out coming to Hawaii someday, but clearly wanted to avoid any notion of moral equivalence. In Japan, Pearl Harbor is not seen as a parallel for the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, but as an attack on a military installation that did not target civilians.

Bomb survivor Kinuyo Ikegami, 82, paid her own respects at the cenotaph before the politicians arrived.

“I could hear schoolchildren screaming: ‘Help me! Help me!’” she said, tears running down her face. “It was too pitiful, too horrible. Even now it fills me with emotion.”

Obama went out of his way, in speaking to the dead, to mention that thousands of Koreans and a dozen American prisoners were among those who died. It was a nod to advocates for both groups who had publicly warned the president not to forget about them in Hiroshima.

In a brief visit to the museum at the Peace Park, Obama visited a display about a young girl who survived the bombing but died several years later of leukemia. She folded paper cranes in the hospital until she died and is the inspiration for the story of Sadako and the thousand cranes. ■

PRESIDENT OBAMA SIGNS BILL TO REMOVE ‘ORIENTAL’

By P.C. Staff

President Barack Obama signed the H.R. 4238 bill on May 20, striking the word “Oriental” from federal law.

The bill’s original author, Rep. Grace Meng (D-NY), introduced the initiative late last year, and the bill was passed unanimously by the House of Representatives on Feb. 29. On May 9, the Senate passed it again with 76 members of Congress as co-sponsors and 51 members of the Congressional Asian Pacific American Caucus.

The new bill targets outdated language used to describe racial groups.

“The term ‘Oriental’ is an insulting and outdated word, and the Senate’s passage of the bill will soon force the U.S. government to finally stop using it,” Meng said in a statement.

“I thank my colleagues in the House and Senate for recognizing the need to pass this long-overdue legislation,” she added. “Our government should not refer to any ethnicity in a derogatory manner, and very shortly this offensive and antiquated term will be gone for good.”

This new law will target and remove the last sections of racial terminology of the U.S. Code. In Title 42 of the U.S. Code for the Department of Energy Organization Act, “a Negro, Puerto Rican, American Indian, Eskimo, Oriental or Aleut or is a Spanish-speaking individual of Spanish descent” will be replaced with “Asian American, Native Hawaiian, a Pacific Islander, African American, Hispanic, Puerto Rican, Native American or an Alaskan Native.”

“‘Oriental’ is a throwback to a time when Asian Americans were viewed as an amorphous population from a geographically-incorrect region known as the Orient, which exists as neither continent nor country. An Oriental could be a rug or a person or any object that could be vaguely associated with cultures east of Europe,” said JACL Executive Director Priscilla Ouchida. “I congratulate Sen. Hirono and Congresswoman Meng for their leadership in ensuring federal law recognizes our self-identity. The new law is a solid step toward eliminating derogatory racial references.”

Other parts of the bill will erase “Negros, Spanish-speaking, Orientals, Indians, Eskimos and Aleuts” from the 1976 public-works act.

The new change looks to reflect America’s steps in addressing race and ethnicity. However, archaic attitudes can leave lasting marks and survive through the law even long after popular culture has moved on. Parts of the government, like the U.S. Census Bureau, have undergone similar revisions.

In 1850, the available categories were “black, mulatto” or “white,” but by 1860, “Indians” for Native Americans and “Chinese” made their first appearances on the census. Those from India didn’t have box until 1920, written as “Hindu.” Hindu, is a religious identity and not an ethnic one.

One of the bureau’s changes included the 2013 announcement that it would no longer use “Negro” on its forms despite being used for almost a century.

But as the federal law moves to eliminate the outdated terms, states still retain some of the racial terms in their statutes like New Jersey’s education code.

The code asks educators in the state to include “the history of the Negro in America” as part of the curriculum. The Mississippi State University of Agriculture and Applied Sciences in General has a 4-H camp in Madison County “for the purpose of teaching the Negro boys and girls of Mississippi standards of better farm and homemaking.” Additionally, New York includes a code requiring sickle-cell anemia tests “to teach applicant for marriage license who is not of the Caucasian, Indian or Oriental race.” Sickle cell anemia is a genetic blood disorder.

But some states have fought for anti-discrimination labels like Pennsylvania. The state prohibits “Caucasian, Negroid, Chinese, Asian Immigrant, French Hawaiian, Arab, Oriental, African-American and Irish” in housing advertisements.

Sen. Mazie Hirono, a sponsor to the bill in the Senate, said in statement that “after months of advocacy in both chambers of Congress, derogatory terms in federal law will finally be updated to reflect our country’s diversity.” ■

CALIFORNIA GOVERNOR PENS A MEMORIAL DAY LETTER OF SUPPORT FOR NISEI SOLDIERS STAMP

California Gov. Jerry Brown has voiced support for a U.S. commemorative postage stamp that would honor the patriotism of Japanese American World War II soldiers. Brown's letter was sent to U.S. Postmaster General Megan Brennan in time for Memorial Day, as the nation remembered those who died while in service in the U.S. Armed Forces. During World War II, more than 800 Japanese Americans soldiers perished.

"On behalf of the State of California, I respectfully urge you to approve a commemorative stamp to honor the patriotism exhibited by Japanese Americans during World War II," Brown wrote in his May 23 letter to Brennan.

"I urge you to issue this stamp in time for next year's 75th anniversary, remembering the order of internment of Japanese Americans. This stamp will help preserve the memory and help educate and promote dialogue on this important part of our history for generations to come," Brown added.

Executive Order 9066, signed in February 1942 by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, led to the incarceration of more than 120,000 Japanese Americans during the war.

This letter is a first from a state governor. Other letters of support for the Nisei Soldiers Stamp campaign have been sent by numerous city, county and state officials. This year, 32 members of Congress joined California Representatives Mark Takai and Judy Chu in a letter that backs the stamp.

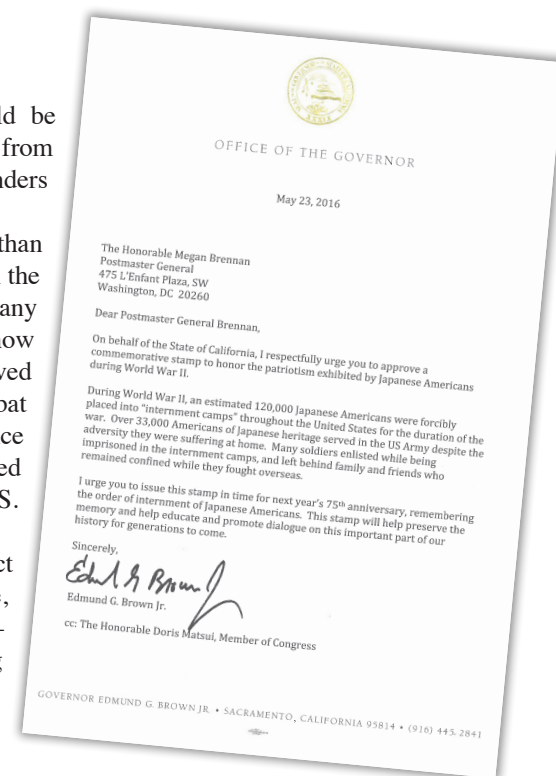

"This Memorial Day, we are grateful for Governor Brown's bold stance in support of this historic stamp subject," said Wayne Osako, co-chair of the "Stamp Our Story Campaign," which is spearheading the nationwide effort. "We encourage governors and members of Congress to join Governor Brown and take a stand for this legendary group of American soldiers."

The 11-year campaign continues to push forward as the Postal Service considers the proposal. If issued, the stamp would be the first to feature a historical subject from the Asian American Pacific Islanders community.

Despite the incarceration, more than 33,000 Japanese Americans enlisted in the U.S. Army during World War II. Many enlisted saying that they did so to show their American patriotism. Most served in the 100th/442nd Regimental Combat Team, as well as the Military Intelligence Service. These groups are considered among the most decorated units in U.S. military history.

Supporters are being asked to contact their governors by email and phone, which can be found on each governor's website. Also, people are being encouraged to continue to reach out to members of Congress to write their own letters of support, which can be found on the campaign's website at www.StampOurStory.org.

REIMAGINE EVERYTHING

DISRUPT EVERYTHING

Looking for your next career move? AARP can help!

By Ron Mori

In 2009, one of the most rewarding jobs that I ever held was eliminated. I had survived so many corporate restructurings and felt guilty when close colleagues lost their jobs. So, I felt that it was my turn. But the timing was terrible: My career was disrupted in one of the worst economic times since the Great Depression.

During this time, I was a few months from turning 50, and age discrimination did cross my mind. I quickly eliminated any negative thoughts and reminded myself that I have skills and valuable experiences for today's workplace.

Fast forward, I did survive but not without a lot of pain, self-reflection and openness to learning the new dynamics of today's job search. The reality was, I was looking for the ideal job that matched my skills and experience in a terrible economy. The question I had to ask myself was, "Where do I begin my search for a job in a market that has moved into the Digital Age?"

Well, I'm happy to report that I landed at AARP and survived moving my family to Northern Virginia. If you are like me, looking to land that next great gig, AARP has resources to make your career transition easier.

Just check out www.aarp.org/work, where you'll find ways to stay happy where you are now, tips to start your search for the next step in your career or even starting your own business. If you're like I used to be, and worry about your age, there are articles about working at 50-plus.

You will also have access to nearly 300 employers from the AARP Employer Pledge Program, such as UnitedHealth Group, American Red Cross and KPMG LLP, who value what experienced workers bring to the workplace and recruit from across diverse age groups. You can read more about the AARP Employer Pledge Program at www.aarp.org/work/job-search/employer-pledge-companies.

We all know that the task of searching for a job has changed in recent years. Looking for a job now is more than just submitting your résumé and waiting for a call back. Applying for a job must be coupled with networking, which increases your chances of landing that next great gig. Using your social networks is key to your job search. Not only should you tell your friends, but also tell friends of friends that you are seeking employment. Now is the time to sharpen your job-searching skills.

AARP can help with that, too. The AARP Technology Education Center has a host of short skill-building videos and webinars to help you learn how to brand and promote yourself and how to use social media in your job search. You can explore AARP's TEK (Technology, Education, Knowledge) information at www.aarp.org/tek.

If you feel overwhelmed by today's gadgets, AARP TEK also has a host of refresher courses on how to use technology to stay organized, manage projects, manage change and communicate better. In addition, there are several Microsoft Office refresher courses available. And let's face it, everyone uses Microsoft Office, right?

Recently, I was having lunch with a friend, and we were sharing notes about the days of Lotus 123, and how neither of us use Uber and would rather pay more for a taxi. You can refuse to keep up with the times or choose to evolve. Just don't be too resistant to some change now and then, because you don't want to be left behind when everyone around you has moved on. Looking for work in the modern world requires modern thinking.

Perhaps you're looking to shift careers, and you're not sure of what that might be. Whether you are looking for a job, changing careers or managing unemployment, AARP can help you along the way.

Happy job hunting!

Take American Apparel, for example. The company was founded on a basic premise: Make everything in America, with American workers, and pay those workers a decent wage. Sounds a lot like Trump's plan to patch up a middle class yet to recover from the flight of good factory jobs.

American Apparel filed for bankruptcy last October. It was a good idea, but in the end, American consumers were unwilling to spend $80 on a plain sweatshirt and $10 on a pair of socks. I doubt that will change anytime soon.

Even if the U.S. slapped astronomical protective tariffs on goods imported from Asia to make American-made goods competitive, and even if American companies decided to bring their factories back and with them millions of steady blue-collar jobs, the prices of consumer goods would be so high we'd be forced to spend a vastly increased percentage of our incomes on things like clothes, cars and appliances — things we're used to getting dirt-cheap because we can pay people in countries without unions and without minimum wages or meaningful safety regulations next to nothing.

In England, take out those Eastern European and Middle Eastern immigrants and you'd be left with a country without bus drivers, janitors, waiters, cabbies — all jobs most Britons tend to think they're above. It's the same in America.

Trump says he's going to deport all the undocumented immigrants in the U.S., but he knows that too many industries depend on a pool of workers they can underpay, who are terrified of going to the police and who are unable to join a union.

Here and at home it comes down to the same thing: Britons and Americans want the pluses of both a globalized and a protectionist economy, but we don't want the flip sides of either.

We want the cheap goods, the $5 T-shirts from big-box retailers and the TV's that seem to get less expensive every year. We want the jobs to stay in England and America, and we want them to pay enough to lead a decent life on. But we don't want to pay $80 for a sweatshirt, and we don't want factories to decamp for Asia and Mexico.

It'll come down to a question of what we value more: jobs or cheap stuff. But there could be a third option — workers in places like China and Bangladesh could unionize, gain representation and push for livable wages that could raise the cost of doing business in those countries.

U.S. wages could become competitive again, and so long as the factory owners fail to find a new unregulated and nonunionized pool of labor to draw from the Chinese and Bangladeshi workers would not necessarily be sacked. We'd have a truly competitive global economy, one in which certain pools of workers are not favored over others simply because they are vastly cheaper or vastly more expensive to employ.
